WEDNESDAY EVENING, APRIL 20.

RESCUE OF AN INDIAN MAIDEN.—An Apache Indian near the head gate of the canal has been seriously sick for a long time. All the noted medicine men have been employed from time to time to treat him. At present the great men of San Carlos are attending him. Some of them began a low chanting song at nightfall, breaking out now and then into a wild, weird refrain. This they kept up all night while the chief medicine man put in the night blowing smoke over the sick man and, cutting long gasches with a sharp knife, pretends to draw worms therefrom. Night before last they concluded that their patient was bewitched by a sixteen-year-old squaw named Calue and determined on her death. They brought her into their camp, but that night she escaped, but was brought back the following day, hung up by the hands, and preparations began to be made to disembowel her on that night. The squaw's mother, who could not overcome her parental feelings of affection, even to satisfy the demands of her traditional religious belief in witchcraft, came down crying to Mohawk and related the circumstances. Capt. F. W. Smith and G. W. Norton hitched up a team and went up and rescued the intended victim. The Indians are very angry and threaten to kill the mother of the squaw.—Tama (New Mexico) Sentinel.
